If you have received any clothes from the school because this has happened, can you please wash them and return them to the school.

TO DO LISTS

Lists can be a great tool for sorting through thoughts and deciding what to get done on a given day, and the only thing more gratifying than writing a to-do list is slowly ticking everything off one at a time.

I know myself, that I love a good to-do list as it helps me organise my day. We ambitiously give ourselves piles of work and tasks. If you are like me then you probably give yourself too many to ever get done on a normal day.

We are terrible at predicting how productive we'll actually be, which inevitably sets us up for failure and the negative feelings that come with it.

So instead of writing a huge to-do list and struggling to get through it, try the 1-3-5 to-do list, made popular by the executive vice chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, Betty Liu. This method helps you to be realistic about your goals, and actually get things done.

Here's how:

- Pick one large task to begin your list. This could either be large in terms of the time it will take you, or large in terms of difficulty (or both!).
- Next, choose three medium-sized tasks. These are not typically quick or easy, but won't take half a day to complete either.
- Finally, choose five quick, easy tasks to add to your list that only take 5-10 minutes each. This could be something like 'call dentist to make a booking' or 'respond to X email'.

The 1-3-5 to-do list method works so well because it can help you realistically manage your workload rather than overloading yourself.

Here's to actually crossing everything off your to-do list!

Finishing this newsletter article now allows me to tick a medium task of my to-do list!
